The way people are looking at art institutions is permanently under discussion, and the curators and artists are testing out the role of the museum, or kunsthalle in society. The visitors of an exhibition might ask themselves, in what way institutional work could be linked to an artistic practice: What would the everyday of an art institution look like? The most trivial things of course, having coffee breaks, Monday meetings and answering the mail. But the everydayness of decision making, whose in and whose out, could it be linked to something visual at all?

Mike Bode & Staffan Schmidt portrayed six art institutions in six different countries, by interviewing curators and art students, documenting several familiar or revealing viewpoints of the architecture and its surrounding, and commenting on their own researches. They found out differences and likeness by zooming out and away from the programming of the institutions by raising questions related to the actual spaces for art. The questions raised are, predominantly, directed towards the expectations that the interviewed have in connection with the spaces: The physical spaces, but also the motives, drives and expectations linked to art and the practice of displaying art. In what way does an art space contribute to the city, to society, to a community? One main topic of interest is the transitional space for art, provided by society, with a history no longer than modernity itself.

The presentation of Mike Bode & Staffan Schmidt's project consists of three parallel videoprojections and two separate audio systems.

The length of the audio-visual presentation is 35'37"

The presentation at Kunsthalle Helsinki is the first time the project will be exhibited. It is followed by an exhibition at Kunst-Werke Berlin from November 27, 2004 to January 9, 2005 and at Contemporary Art Center Vilnius from January to February 2005.

The project is realized in collaboration with the following institutions:

Statens Museum for Kunst/the x-room and the Schools of Visual Arts of the Royal Danish Academy of Fine Arts in Copenhagen (DK)

Kunsthalle Helsinki and Academy of Fine Arts in Helsinki (FI)

Kunst-Werke and Berlin University of the Arts in Berlin (DE)

Contemporary Art Centre and Vilnius Art Academy in Vilnius (LT)

National Museum for Contemporary Art and the National Academy of Fine Art in Oslo (NO)
